Jafar Panahi: Silence is participation in darkness

Iranian director Jafar Panahi, nominated for his film "It Was Just an Accident," which won the Palme d'Or at Cannes, opened the ceremony with a powerful speech about the situation in Iran. Introduced by Mark Cousins as "one of the world's greatest filmmakers," he addressed the "unprecedented massacre" and ongoing oppression, bloodshed, and repression by the Iranian government against protesters. "If the world does not respond to this blatant violence today, not only Iran but the entire world is at risk," said Panahi. "Violence, when left unanswered, becomes normalized. It spreads. It becomes contagious. When the truth is crushed in one place, freedom suffers everywhere. Then no one is safe, anywhere in the world. Not in Iran. Not in Europe. Not in America."

He urged filmmakers and the audience not to remain silent, emphasising that "silence is a participation in darkness." He received a standing ovation, setting a serious, activist tone for the night—especially poignant given his own risk of returning to prison in Iran.

Liv Ullmann Takes on Trump

Norwegian actress Liv Ullmann suggested U.S. President Donald Trump is unlikely to remain in possession of the Nobel Peace Prize gifted to him this past week by Venezuelan opposition leader María Corina Machado. The actress, director, screenwriter, and late Ingmar Bergman muse voiced her surprise at the move at the European Film Awards in Berlin on Saturday, after being presented with a Lifetime Achievement Award by Juliette Binoche.

"I'm so proud that I was part of entertainment, of films, specifically now today, when the world is strange and scary and difficult to solve... what is happening now is out of understanding, really," she said. "We have laws in Norway - If you misuse a Nobel prize, we can take it away from you. So, someone in the United States will soon be disappointed."
